

I am a flight attendant for United Airlines. I am appalled that anyone would consider allowing cell phones on board a flight. As if people aren't already over the edge these days with airport security, small aircraft, cramped space, no leg room, lousy or no food, and then they will get the pleasure of listening to 15 or 20 people seated near them, cell phone conversations for inflight entertainment? Terrorist would have a field day, easy communications between each other, swapping information between cabins or flights. And does anyone really know for sure that two or three hundred phones all being used at once on an airplane won't interfere with communications? I would just as soon not take a chance on my flights. Let people make their calls before take-off and after landing. If they must make a call inflight, let them use the airphone and pay the price rather than all of us having to pay a major price should something go wrong with inflight cell phone use. This is just my opinion, but with 36 years of experience as a flight attendant I feel it is a knowledgeable opinion. Thank you.
